Museums: to charge or not to charge?

There are many museums in the world and in our country. Some of them charge for admissions and other are free to visit. Some people say that it is right to take money from museum visitors, but also there are people who argue that visiting museums should be free. Some time ago I was thinking about it and I am going to tell you conclusions I have made.

In my opinion, there is no general answer for this question, and case of every museum should be analyzed individually.

Firstly, there are two types of museums: ones that are provided with money by the state and ones that are not. To my mind, first category of museums should be free to visit, as it already receives money. For the second group of museums, it is difficult to give answer for because there may be other factors.

Secondly, there are small and large museums, and answer depends on museum's size significantly.

If museum is rather large and it doesn't receive money from the state, I think it is right to take some money from visitors, because in large museums there are many people working in it to keep it in good condition. If museum is rather small, there is no need to take a lot of money because there are usually one-two workers in it.

If museum charges for admissions, paid should not be very expensive. On other side, people may want to give museum some money for on their visit, if it is free to visit.

In conclusion, I think that museums are very important and should be provided with money by government.
