Determination.

The weather was cold and frosty. Harsh wind blew onto Nathan's red, puffy face as hot tears were dripping down his cheeks. "I can't believe it happened," he whispered, "this is the worst day of my life..." Dark, negative thoughts rushed through his head. Today Nathan got fired again. It was the last available job for him. The boss told him that the company needed a better worker. Nathan didn't have any support anymore. He hasn't seen his family for decades. He felt like the most miserable human being ever.

Feeling defeated, he slipped and fell into a cold pile of snow. "I can't even pay my rent anymore... The landlady will kick me out in a day or two," he thought. After a few minutes his limbs were starting to become numb from the cold, but he didn't bother moving a single inch. "I wonder if this all will end if I stay like this for a while." He closed his eyes and thought about his dear family. He remembered the happiest, the sweetest moments of his short life. His first day of school, his little sister's laugh, his first love flashed behind his eyes. Until he heard a faint squeak.

After opening his teary, bloodshot eyes, he noticed a tiny white kitten lying on top of him and staring at him. "Hey there, little buddy," he smiled, "are you trying to get warm like this? You are so cute." The kitten started purring. Nathan hugged the little one, crying again. "Let me take you home and give you something to eat." And this moment Nathan knew he will get through anything. His soul filled with determination.
