Another richness

Once upon a time, in a kingdom far far away, there lived a merchant. He was the richest in his town. His name was Victor. Victor had a huge and beautiful house with lots of servants. His home was an outstanding place: There were Eastern carpets, ancient statues and beautiful paintings. It could be compared even with the king's palace.

But the merchant was a scrooge. He looked on the simple people from above. Victor knew ^{neither} ~~no~~ empathy, nor humanity. He was very cruel and treated everyone around as an animal.

One hot summer day he decided to have a walk in a park. As he was coming closer people went away, because nobody wanted to come across with him. Only one man stayed. Everyone told him to leave but he remained still.

Victor couldn't stand seeing him in front of his way.
— How dare you? Can't ^{you} see I'm having a walk? Go away, or you will be kicked out by my guards.
— I see no need in my ~~being~~ ^{leaving}. We're all the same. I can walk here as you do.
But Victor didn't listen. The man was taken by his servants and brought away.

The summer in the kingdom was hot. It was no rain for weeks and people suffered from drought and fires. Unfortunately, such a disaster visited Victor ^{at night}. His house was burnt. He was lucky to escape himself. That night he lost everything he had, all his fortune. Although he thought of his servants to be devoted and helpful, all of them turned their backs to merchant.

Only one ~~man~~ offered him his help. It was the man Victor had met in the park. He was very surprised:
— Why do you do me such a favour? I ~~had~~ treated you badly and now you offer me your help?

He told the merchant that everybody deserved the second chance. People are all the same and all of them can be mistaken.

After this occasion Victor completely changed his ways of treating the people. He lost all his fortune, but he became rich in feelings, mentally rich.
