Writing The Sense of Guilt

My first skating competition was a few weeks ago. This experience is very confusing for me. Coaches thought that I'm going to do great. My parents were very proud of me, and I was extremely confident in my skills as well. But something went wrong.

When⁵⁰ we arrived at the skating rink, I saw a familiar face. I recognised her quickly. I used to hate this girl. Her smile made me feel sick because I couldn't admit that she was more skilled than me. She looked so graceful and gorgeous while skating... When I watched her routines, my blood was boiling from anger and envy towards her. So I decided to replace her skates with cheap, broken ones that I found in a locker room. This way I could win the competition easily. I caught a moment when the girl wasn't looking and switched her skates. Then I heard my inner voice screaming at me for doing such a wrong thing. At first I tried to ignore it, but then the sense of guilt was eating my soul away. When it was my turn to skate, I made a lot of mistakes in my routine and fell a couple of times. I felt so disappointed in myself that I ended up crying in the bathroom for a few minutes. The poor girl whom I betrayed fell during her routine too but she got a better score than I did mine.

This moment changed me. I realised that doing wrong things is not ^{only} bad for the person you let down, but it is also bad for ^{yourself} myself. I still feel guilty for this. I tried to apologise to the girl but she doesn't want to talk. I don't blame her for that. I learned an important lesson.
